AN IRISH SKETCH, BY MRS. C. HALL.

" Some call it Providence, and others fate."

"Well ma'am dear, I never thought that re'r going into foreign parts, would make a neathen of ye entirely. To be sure, it turns the mind a little to leave one's own people; but to shift that way against what the whole world knews to be as true as gospel! It's myself that could'nt even it to you, at all, at all-so I couldn't-if I hadn't heard it with my own ears!" "I assure you, Moyna, you are very much mistaken in imagining that the whole world dopt your notions of predestination, for-" "I ax ye'r pardon for interupting you, my lady; but I said nothing about p apra-1 can't twist my tong round the word," continued Moyna; adding, with that exhuberant vanity which prevents the Irish from viz ever pleading guilty to the sin of ig

-- "Not but I've often heard it before." " Predestination, Moyna, means what you call Luck-a thing you believe you cunnot avoid-a sort of spirit that deals out to you good or evil, in defiance of your own wishes.

Moyna looked puzzled-exceedingly puzzled: she knocked the ashes out of her pipe against the post originally intended to support a gate, which, according to Moyna's reading, "her luck" had prevented from being either made or hung; and, stuffing her middle finger into the bowl of the little puffing medium, so as to ascertain that no hidden fire remained it its recess, she returned it to her pocket, clasped her hands so as to grasp the post within their palms and leaning against it, one foot crossed over the instep of the other, she turned her head a little round, and called to her husband by the familiar but affectionate appellation of

'Tim a vourneen!" "Tim," or to speak correctly Timothy Brady, made his conge from beneath the roof of a picturesque but most comfortless sheeling-a cottage that would have looked Where he has on Hand

The lord of the means, says he, and make my respects to one mansion imported his own mutton into the woman that owns ye.' Now, ma'am England; and the master of the other as- | dear, mind the luck! something or other sured his London friends, that his agent hindered Moyna from taking my brogues to assured him, that the peasantry in the be mended to the brogue-maker's that night. neighbourhood of his park were "the finest | So I couldn't go the next day, and that very and happiest peasautry on the face of the evening a great splinter ran into my foot out But neither the one nor the other of the spade-handle." had any thing to do with my poor cotter and his wife, for it was many years since they had visited their estates. Had it been thought more wisely, and acted more discreetly. Timothy Brady differed in nothing from the generality of kis countrymen, except that he was "better learned," for he could read and write, and, when a lad, was in athletic form, Moyna had ever been a of poison I would have drank it."

careless, affectionate "slob of a girl," who would "go from Bantry to Boyne to sarve me on her bare knees," but had little idea of serving herself. Such a character is not improved by age; but there was a time when I had hoped a better fate for Timothy. His sunken eye became bright and animated when he saw one who had rendered him some service, and he pulled up his stockings over his bare legs, with that striking regard to propriety which an Irish peasant rarely forgets in the presence of a female. *After the usual civilities had passed, Moyna commenced-

"The lady's at me agin about the luck and now, may be, she'll have the goodness to sap what she sain a while ago.'

"I told your wife that predestination is what she calls luck, and that she would agree very well with the Turks." "The Turks!" repeated Moyna, throwing up her hands and eyes in horror. "Oh, ma'am, honor, I never thought you'd even the Turks to one of your own country! Oh, Tim, Tim! was I like a Turk when I sat by your bed, night and day, while ye had the typhus fever? Was I like a Turk when I took Mary Clooney's child from off the dead breast of its mother, and she kilt at the same time by that very fever that kilt her husband? Was I like a Turk kilt her husband? when I took the bed, thet was no bed, only a lock of straw, from under me, that blind Barry might die dacent and easy, in consi deration of the high, family that owned him ? Was I like a Turk then''—

"Moyna, will ye whisth, woman dear -you have no understanding; the lady only meant that you and the Turks had different names for the same thing. Wans's that it? I bowed and smiled.

"Was that it? Och bother?-to be sure we have different names. I ax ye'r pardon, but I think ye said I'd agree with might have waited; but never heed,' and I the Turks?"

"Yes, good Moyna, in one thing! you believe in luck, and so do they."

Moyna was appeased, and Timothy took up the matter.

"There's no denying luck, nor no going against it, lady dear, that's the short and the long of it. It's my luck naver to make as much by any thing as another. Why the bonneen we reared from the size o' my hand, that Dorney Cobb offered me my money for at Candlemas, caught could and died at Easter-sorra a man on the common had the luck to lose a pig but myself!

" How did it catch cold?"

"Out of nothing in the world but my luck; it was used poor thing! to sleep in the cabin with ourselves, as the sty had no roof; but a neighbour's child was sick, and my woman axed some of the family in, and the pig was forced, out of manners, to give up his bed and sleep in the sty, which, as it had no roof, let in the rain. And it was mournful to hear the wheezing he had in the morning; and to see him turn his back to the pick of the mealy potatoes just before he died." "Well, Timothy, I should call that mismanagement . I do not see either good or bad luck in the case; for it is clear that, if the sty had been roofed, the pig would not have been accustomed to cottage warmth, and consequently could not have caught cold. " Well, lady; listen-it was my luck entirely that hindered my roofing the sty.

I'll tell ye all about it. Did ye know Tom Dooly?—serra a hand's turn he'd do from day morning till Saturday night-barring the height of mischief. Ye didn't know Tom ?-well, ma'm, I'm sure ye mind his brother Micky-'One-eyed Mick,,' he was called, because he as good as lost the other in a bit of a spree at the fair of Rath-mullin, and could get no justice for it." "No justice for the spree, do you mean, Timothy?"

"No, ma'm, I mean no justice for his eye; clearly proving there's no law for the poor-God help them. The boy he fought with was as good as thirty years older than himself, a tough old fellow, with a cruckstick skull that nothing could harm. So Mick knowed that, and he never offered at the head, but the shins, which he broke as compleat as any thing you ever saw. So the magistrate set the ould boy's shins against Micky's eye, and bid them make it up. Ah! there's no law for the poor at all,

"But, Timothy, let us get back to where we set out—the pig-sty."

"Troth, yes," returned Tim, "though I'm sorry to take a lady to a dirty subject. Tom Dooly says to me, says he, 'Tim, ye're

*I may mention, by the way, a striking in stance of this characteristic. Some friends of otherwise, Timothy and Moyna must have mine were on a hoating excursion, a few years ago, in Bantry Bay, and a lady was filling to each of the boatmen a glass of whiskey. Ob-serving that one of them was looking in an opposite direction, she slyly dipped the glass into the water and handed it to him in lieu of the more agreeable beverage. The man took it, bowed, and-while the eyes of the whole party read and write, and, when a lad, was in great esteem as a "mass server," and noted haps, an oath—drank it off, returned the glass, as being "remarkable handsome at the with a "thank ye kindly, ma'um," and without altar." I had not seen him for some time, and was struck with the painful change which a few years had made in his fine like salt-water?" "No, ma'am, I do not like salt-water?" "No, ma'am, I do not like salt-water, but if you had given me a glass

"Stop, my good friend, if the spadehandle was splintered, why did you not mend it?"

"Ma'am, dear, that was a way you have ever and always tripping a body up in their story. Sure I did mend-that is, I eased it with a bit of a cord. But my luck hindered me, and the bad foot, from going the day after that; and one thing or another came across me, until it was just a week before I could go for the straw. Well, the black boy himself put it into my head to borrow Matthew Maccan's white mare. Take her and welcome,' says Matty; but mind, if you put yourself or any thing else on her, she'll kick till she smashes every bone in your body, though she'll draw a creel or a cart till the day of judgment, as easy as May butter.' Thank ye kindly, Matthew,' says I, 'I'll mind fast enough,' and away I went. And at his own gate I saw Tom, as great as Cromwell, with his hands in his pockets, and a silk Barcelona round his neck, like any gentleman. To be sure the luck of the people! 'Good evening kindly,' says I. 'Where are you going with Matthew Maccan's beast?' says he. No farther than this, says I, until I go home again.' 'I'm always glad to see an ould friend,' says he, 'but why didn't you come,' says he again, 'for the barley straw?' Sure I'm come for it now,' says I. 'You are!' says he, opening his great grey eyes, at me like a wild cat; 'sorra as much for ye then, as would build a sparrow's nest,' says the traiter: 'If ye'd been glad of it, you would have come when you was bid to come, and not let a whole week rowl over your head. I gave the straw to Jemmy Hatchet, and by this time it's no straw, but a roof, and a good one too, to his sty, and his neat clean barn. ' It's ill done of you,' says I, as cool as a cabbage-leaf, though my blood was boiling at the ill luck that follows me; 'ye turned the horse round to come home. 'Sure,' says he, 'ye're not going to stir ill-blood out of the offer I made ye from kindness; if ye did not take advantage of it, it was your fault, not mine.' 'Well, I didn't value the straw a tradeen, ma'm dear; I've a spirit above it; but I did not like his bestowing his dirty straw upon Jemmy Hatchet; so I makes answer, 'Do you say I'm in fault?' 'To be sure I do,' he says with a grin of a laugh. 'Then by this, and by that,' I says, swearing a great whale of an oath, that I'd be sorry to repeat before a lady, 'I'll make ye eat both y'er words and the straw.' 'Ye can't,' says he, 'and what's more, ye dar'n't; a'n't I the priest's nephew?' 'Well, that would rouse the blood of a wood-queest, for it was cowardly-like; and, as my luck would haveit, I hit him an unlucky blow; and a dale of sorrow it got me into; for I had the world and all of penance, to say nothing of being had up, and he swearing he gave no provocation. For sartin I didn't mean to have struck so hard, and didn't think his bones were so soft. But that wasn't all of it-going home, the trouble of what I had done uppermost, I forgot what Mat said about the horse, and got on the horse's back who made no more ado, but kicked and plunged, and pitched me into the thick of a pond full of young ducks and geese; and two ganders set upon me, and as good as tore the eyes out of my head, before I could get out of the water; and I had to pay two and three halfpence for the young that was killed in the scrummage. And well I know it's long afore such luck would have followed any other boy in the parish but myself. Now, ma'm dear, isn't that luck !"

" Is your story finished Tim?" "It just is, ma'am, darling; that is, I mean the sty story is finished; but I could tell ye twenty as good, and better, too, to show you what ill luck I have."

"There is no luck, ill or well, that I can see from beginning to end. Your misfortunes entirely arise out of your want of punctuality: had your shoes been mended, as they ought to have been, you could have gone for the straw with comfort on the evening you were desired. Still, their not being mended was no excuse for your want of punctuality. You put me in mind of an anecdote I heard once of two Irishmen, who were too lazy to pluck the figs that hung over their heads in a beautiful garden in Italy. There they lay on their backs, beneath a tree covered with fruit, their mouths open for the figs to fall into. At last a fig, by what you would call 'luck,' fell into the mouth of one of these Irishmen. 'What a lucky dog you are, Paddy!' said the other, opening his great mouth still more widely. don't know that, Looney,' replied Paddy, after swallowing the fig, 'for I have had the trouble of chewing it!"

" Agh, ma'm hooney! I wonder how you have the heart to tell such stories against your own country; letting the foreigners laugh at us this way." "Listen, Timothy; how would your own case [read? Timothy Brady was indicted for an assault upon Mr. Thomas Dooly, who swore that he told the aforesaid Timothy Dooly, that, if he came to him on the evening of the first of May, he would make him a present of a load of straw to thatch his pig-sty; that Brady promised to come, but never came until the seventh of May; and, in the meantime, he, Thomas Dooly, think ing that Brady did not wish to thatch his pig-sty, had given the load of straw to an industrious man, who did thatch his pigsty; that, when Timothy Brady found the straw had been given, he, without any provocation-"Oh, easy, ma'am dear !--you forget the laugh."

"And who could help laughing ?-" without any provocation did assault the said Thomas Dooly.' Now is it not so, worthy Timotheus?'

I wished them both a kind good-morrow, and had nearly arrived at the village where we lodged, when panting and breathless, Moyna overtook me. "What's the matter, Moyna?" "Oh, the man has the toothach so bad that I'm forced to run for a pipe, the smoking does it good."

"What, has he not a pipe?",

"He had, ma'am, but he lent it to Bri-ney Moore."

"But I saw you put a pipe in your pocket not twenty minutes ago.

"So you might, ma'am dear that's my luck; it would have stayed quiet and easy in any body else's pocket, but there was a hole in mine, so it walked out, and broke, without so much as by ye'r leave."

"Why did you not mend the hole?" "I laith, ma'am, honey, if I did it would break out again," said Moyna, with some impatience of tone and gesture. "Where's the good of any thing, when we've no luck?" Poor Moyna! she would have been very angry had she known that I again compared her to the Turks, and was more than ever satisfied that, till belief in fatalism is rooted out, poor Ireland will " have no luck!" -Amulet for 1833.

VARIETIES.

Milliner' Apprentices .- Many is the milliners' apprentice whom every London season sends to her grave, because the dresses of fine ladies must be completed with a degree of celerity which nothing but night labour can accomplish. To the question, "When must it be done?" "Immediately," is the readiest answer; though it is an answer which would, perhaps, be less inconsiderately and indiscriminately given, if it were known how many young creatures have come to a premature death in consequence of it, and how many hearts have been hardened by the oppression which it necessitates. Nor does the evil stop there. The dressmakers' apprentices, in a great city, have another alternative; and it is quite as much to escape from the intolerable labours which are imposed upon them in the Loudon season, as from any sexual frailty, that such multitudes of them adopt a vocation which affords some immediate relief, whilst it ensures a doubly fatal termination of their career. The temptations by which these girls are beset might be deemed sufficient, without the compulsion by which they are thus, as it were, driven out into the streets. Upon them "the fatal gift of beauty" has been more lavishly bestowed than upon any other class—perhaps not excepting even the aristocracy. They are many of them, probably, the spurious offspring of aristocratical fathers, and inherit beauty for the same reason as the legitimate daughters of aristocrats, because the wealth of these persons enables them to select the most heautiful women either for wives or for concubines. Nor are they wanting in the grace and simplicity of manner which distinguish the aristocracy; whilst constant manual occupation produces in them more vacuity of mind than even that which dissipation causes in their sisters of the superior class. They are thus possessed of exterior attractions, which will, at any moment, place them in a situation of comparative affluence, and keep them in it so long as those attractions last; a period beyond which their portion of thought and foresight can scarcely be expected to extend: whilst, on the other hand, they have before them a most bitter and arduous servitude, constant confinement, probably a severe task-mistress, (whose mind is harassed and exacerbated by the exigent and thoughtless demands of her employers,) and a destruction of health and bloom, which the alternative course of life can scarcely make more certain or more speedy. If people of fashion knew at what cost some of their imaginary wants are gratified, it is possible that they might feel disposed to forego the gratification. Quarterly Review.

Pilgrimage to Mecca.-The manner of performing the pilgrimage is as follows:—On arriving near Mecca, or while still on board, it is necessary to put on the ehram, (or pilgrim's habit.) On the day on which the pilgrim intends adopting this new dress, he bathes himself, reads two rukat prayers, and puts on the two wrappers-without-seam, which constitute the sacred dress. One is wrapped round the waist; the other thrown loosely over the shoulders and body, the head being kept uncovered. Khurranwan (or wooden pattens) may also be worn. These are not to be dispensed with until he has sacrificed the victim at Meena Bazar, and shaved and bathed himself. Nor is he, in the interim, to commit any of the following acts;-to anoint his head with oil, ghee (or clarified butter,) perfume his clothes, shave any part of his body, pare his nails, put on clothes that are sewed, wear boots, (because they are sewed,) hunt, quarrel, speak or do evil, for, by so doing, he makes himself liable to death; and as an atonement, must sacrifice a sheep, and distribute it among the poor but on no account he is to eat any part of that meat himself. "There are five noxious arimals, however, which there is no harm in killing, viz., a kite, a crow, a scorpion, a mouse, and a mad dog." - Qanoon-e-Islam, a Trans lation from the Oriental.

Life of a Wit .- " Nothing is so fatiguing," said Mrs. Thrale, as the life of a wit. Garrick and Wilkes are the oldest men of their age that I know, for they have both worn themselves out prematurely by being eternally on the rack to entertain others." "David, Madam,' said the Doctor, "looks much older than he is, because his face has had double the business of any other man's; it is never at rest. When he speaks one minute, he has quite a different countenance to that which he assumes the next. I do not believe he ever kept the same look for half an hour together in the whole course of his life; and such a perpetual play of the muscles must certainly wear a man's face out before his time." Conversations between Mrs. Thrule and Dr. Johnson.
